Frequently asked questions

I perform in a stage show for children, do I need a Working with Children (WWC) Check?

No. The applicable category of child-related work for this scenario would be category 18, however, it has a specific exemption for performances open to the general public which do not involve physical contact with children.

I am an actor in a local theatre club of which children are also members – do I need a WWC Check?

No. As you are participating in the club alongside the children you are not undertaking child-related work and a WWC Check is not required.

I am a director in a commercial production of Annie which includes children – do I need a WWC Check?

No. If both the children and adults in the production are employed by the same employer, they are considered to be 'working alongside'. This means that the contact is not child-related work and a WWC Check is not required.

I work in a food truck that is often hired for community events where children are present – do I need a WWC Check?

No. Serving children food at a public event does not require a WWC Check. Even if the event were a children's event and captured under category 18 there is a specific exemption for services that provide food only.

I am volunteering on the registration table at a community art event, where there are children attending as well as adults - do I need a WWC Check?

No. There is no applicable category of child-related work for your role.

The same community arts group also host an annual children’s book week festival, where I undertake the same role, do I need a WWC Check?

Yes. As this is a children’s event, category 18 applies and if your role involves contact with children at the event you will require a WWC Check.

I am part of a national opera company that is touring Australia for three weeks. We will be performing shows specifically for children that will include interactive activities, do I need a Western Australian (WA) WWC Check?

No. You will only require a WWC Check for the state in which you currently reside. The WA WWC legislation provides a specific exemption for child-related work that is carried out by visitors to WA as long as the time in the State does not exceed two weeks. For more information about this exemption see our website.
